Architecture as Archimedial Event

A Discussion on the Substance of Architecture

Abstract

In the course of recent history, ›architecture‹ was usually understood as a thing or a work, even the new point of view introduced by ›functionalism‹ led to architecture being understood as a physical machine. In the 19th century, this understanding made it difficult to subsume urban, landscape and spatial planning under the concept of ›architecture‹, which caused new academic notions and distinct disciplines to be created.
