UrbanHighRise—Between High-rise and City

Abstract

The design of space between public and privacy has been one of the most essential challenges for architects and urban planners. Regarding this issue this article tries to illustrate the fascinating history of high-rise in the midst of highly densed urban fabric.

The social and functional diversity displays the metropolises. An additional approach to define cities could be also made by the relation between density, transit and boundaries. Those three aspects impress the public/open urban spaces, and becomes concretely visible on the urban fabric.
